Lessons of the Bicycle Accident.

The distressing bicycle accident on F street, which resulted in the death of Mr. Launt two days ago, should emphasize two things: First, no one should be permitted to ride or drive on a crowded street at a rate that may endanger life; second, that bicycle and car bells must be rung very judiciously, or the result will be confusion and danger. The persons whom they are intended to direct and save from harm. Many persons seem to think that the ringing of the bell secures the right of way and permits under all circumstances an increase of speed. As a matter of fact the necessity to ring the bell or going ought to warn bicyclist, motorist or driver to slacken his speed to a walk, except when the way is quite clear and there is need to go about as fast as one can. It ought to be thoroughly understood that persons on foot on the street crossing have the right of way, and no vehicle is to be allowed to run any one down, whether a child, a woman or a strong man; and a failure to observe the foot passenger's right ought to be punished promptly and severely, if a death results. In older countries than the United States such matters are treated with much more concern. An accident which results in a death is given a very thorough investigation; usually some person is found to be responsible and is punished accordingly. The "mole" scorchers, who are even more to be feared than his malicious idiot brother on the "bike," and needs to be regulated accordingly.

"Mole" and "Bike" Scorchers.

To the Editor of The Evening Star:

Mr. Richardson's observations in Wednesday's Star in regard to rapid bicycle riding on our streets were timely and to the point. But they did not go far enough. It was not necessary to limit their application to colored riders. White scorchers are quite as plenty, and equally dangerous. Furthermore, bicycle riders are not the only ones to be feared on our streets. They rush along our thoroughfares and around corners at break-neck speed, on their "mole" scorchers, and are as much to be feared as the bicycle riders. Some of them are about as noiseless as the bicycle, and are often driven at a higher rate of speed, and as they are much heavier than any two-wheel vehicle the danger to life and limb, in case of collision, is infinitely greater. The "mole" scorchers are even more to be feared than his malicious idiot brother on the "bike," and needs to be regulated accordingly.
